An article in the October 2002 issue of San Diego Magazine quotes law enforcement sources as stating that the victim in this case was killed in her bedroom. The article's author states that information in the story--including the evidence that the victim was killed in her bedroom--was "at least triple checked." The defense did not learn law enforcement was in possession of this information until after the verdict; this information was not provided to the defense through discovery or otherwise. Information that the victim was killed in her bedroom, whether based on witness interviews, physical evidence or police opinions after investigation of the crime scene is material and relevant to the charged offenses of kidnapping, felony murder and the felony murder special circumstance allegation.
